26 NOV 1973

Backward, Upside Down By Tom Shales Perhaps not since Hitch Perhaps not since

Perhaps not since Hitch-cock's "Topaz" has there been an espionage adventure so lifeless, feckless and nearly endless as Henri Verneuil's "The Serpent," now at the Uptown. In fact, it makes "Topaz" look like a clever thriller and even such dogs as John Huston's recent "The Macintosh Man" seem vital and coherent.

"The Serpent" is plagued with one of the most critical cases of inverted exposition in movie history. Every plot turn is revealed in the least suspenseful and credible way possible, and when it's all over you get the feeling the story has been told backward, upside down, inside out or all three.

Though pieced together with fragments of actual events-including such hot topies as the shot-down U-3 plane piloted by Francis Powers—the tale Gary seems outlandish at every juncture. It begins with a messy defection to the West by a high-ranking official of the Soviet secret police, the "KGB." No sooner is this prize package of defectorheadquarters in suburban Washington than intensive questioning begins—when, he is repeatedly asked, did he last have sexual relations with his wife?

This completed, the film plods on. An apparently angry narrator tries turning it into a documentary on the C1A. The agency stores data on "40 million punch cards," he tells us. Then we are shown yards of grainy footage from old Soviet newsreels, with hoked-up inserts that try to put Yul Brynner, as the KGB defector, into Russian history. It doesn't work, and neither does Brynner, who plays his past as a combination Siamese king and cowboy robot—two of his past movie roles, as it happens.

The film has a rather amazing cast, including Henry Fonda (as CIA chief "Allan Davies"), Dirk Bogarde, Philippe Noiret and, very briefly, Virna Lisi. We also find out whatever happened to both Robert Alda and Farley Granger; they ended up with small parts in clinkers like this one.

The story wanders over to Europe and there stoops to a cliche from the movies of yore: the mysterious killer whose face is hidden but who carries an identifying gimmick. In this ease, the gimmick is a cigarette ease with a gold serpent on it.

prize package of defecterdom delivered to the CIA headquarters in suburban Washington than intensive questioning begins—when, he is repeatedly asked, did he last have sexual relations with his wife?

This completed, the film
There may be a civilized Story here someplace, but Verneuil never finds it. The ruthlessness of espionage head below the completed to the CIA
story here someplace, but Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but
Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but
Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but
Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
Story here someplace, but
Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
story here someplace, but
Verneuil never finds it. The
ruthlessness of espionage
head below the civilized
story here someplace, but when the civilized story here someplace, but when the civilized story here.

Even the einematographer neglected or refused to foeus his camera. Just as well. The pallid blur on the screen is an apt visual counterpart to the floundering script. "The Scripent" should be the bottom half of a double bill at an abandoned drive-in.